

Signal Flow in a typical audio mixer

A typical mixing board functions like a pipeline for an audio signal, with various blocks through which a signal is routed. Each block has a specific function- it routes the signal via aux sends, bus sends, pan, and other controls. The signal always ends up at the mix output.

